

Skip to main contentFind anythingAskLog In

r/neoliberal • 6y ago

FireDistinguishers

Congressional Procedure 104: The Budget

Effortpost

Introduction

I'm an LC in the Senate. Despite the fact that I can't tell you whose staff I currently work on, I can say that I started out on the Hill as an intern for Senator Chris Van Hollen from my home state of Maryland. I really loved that office, and honestly I'd love to go back to it as a permanent staffer, but that's a story for another time.

I'm bringing up Senator Van Hollen because he, like Senator Mikulski whom he succeeded, is a member of the United States Senate Committee on Appropriations, a very prestigious group of human beings dedicated to combining two absurdly complicated things (the Federal budget process and Senate procedure) into an absolute hell of a fun ride. Working alongside the staff of an appropriator is a rare honor among rare honors, because it gives you a front row seat to one of the most critical functions of America's legislature.

That being said, despite the fact that there have been relatively consistent mainstream discussions about the Federal budget since the end of the Clinton administration (mostly discussions about the Federal deficit at that) I'm genuinely surprised to hear that many people I talk to can't identify basic details about how the budget is enacted every year.

So, if you want a better understanding of what happens when Congress passes the budget, either to filter through the news or just because you find it interesting, I hope this post can give you some insight into what's happening on the Hill when money is involved.

The Fiscal Year

The Federal government's fiscal year in the United States (FY20XX) runs from October 1, 20XX-1 to September 30, 20XX. To make that more clear, the current fiscal year is FY2020, which started on October 1, 2019, and will end on September 30, 2020.

Why is the fiscal year not just the calendar year? Well, I've heard doing things like this was thought up to ensure that funding for Federal government activities could be secured before an election, and before the inauguration of a new Congress. I've also heard this nonsense has something to do with the growing cycles of Cotton and Tobacco. In that scenario, having a fiscal year that ends in the middle of the calendar year gave select plantation-owning Members of Congress a way to spend time at home while they were overseeing the harvest and sale of their crops, all without having to worry about missing key votes relating to the budget. That kind of thinking makes more sense when you consider the fiscal year used to run from July 1 to June 30, meaning the early Republic's budget was long secured by the yearly harvest season. Maybe it's both of those things, maybe it's neither (honestly I don't even know when tobacco and cotton are harvested) but regardless of why this is the case, ever since the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 the calendar year starts in October. That's just how things are.

The Agency Negotiation Period

Skip to main contentFind anythingAskLog In

establish specific policy directions and planning levels to guide the preparation of their budget requests. Again, to make this more clear, OMB and the Federal agencies started working on the current (FY2020) budget before April 2018, and right now the agencies are working on the budget for FY2022.

At the start of this part of the process, the President, the Director of OMB, and other officials in the Executive Office of the President work to understand the current budget for this fiscal year, they react to the currently proposed budget that will go in effect for the next fiscal year, and they evaluate program performance within the Executive Branch. Also around this time economic outlook projections are prepared jointly by the Council of Economic Advisers, OMB, and the Treasury Department, and those projections become part of the conversation when they're available.

In early fall, usually after Congress comes back from August recess, the agencies submit their budget requests to OMB, and OMB analysts review the requests to identify issues that OMB higher-ups need to discuss with agency higher-ups. Sometimes OMB and the agencies negotiate things down on their own, but other times the White House upper echelon has to get involved. Regardless of how the numbers come to be, this part of the process is usually finished by late December, giving the White House one full month, and a few days remainder, to finally complete the President's budget request.

Here's why this is important: Members of Congress pay close attention to what the agencies want and need for their programs, because people and groups who depend on those agencies, for whatever reason, will be somebody's constituent. If you're a Member of Congress and you have: a Military base, a National Lab, a University, a Fortune 500 company, a NASA launch site, an interstate highway, or any number of other things in your district, the agencies' opinions matter to you. That's every Member of Congress, by the way, somehow and in some way they all should care, and most of them do care (only a few really egregious offices skip out on listening to agency comments). At the staff level, it's very common for junior and senior staff working for an appropriator to spend a lot of time looking at what the agencies relating to their portfolio would like to see as budget season approaches, collaborating with staffers on the various appropriations subcommittees along the way. Essentially, if you're working for an appropriator, there's always this looming budget work to be done.

The President's Request

According to the Budget and Accounting Act of 1921 the President must submit a budget request every year. Title 31, Section 1105, of the U.S. Code has the due date for this request set "on or after the first Monday in January but not later than the first Monday in February of each year." That's within one year of the budget going into law by the way, so the President's budget request for FY20XX will go live in February 20XX-1. To make it more concrete again, this February the White House released the President's FY2021 budget request.

Sometimes Congress doesn't pay attention to this thing (recent budgets, for example, entirely ignore some of the President's program consolidation requests, look into what the White House wanted to do with Student Support and Academic Enrichment Grants (Title IV, Part A) if you want more information on what that looks like). Most of the time, though, this becomes a partisan process wherein the President's opposition makes whatever budget they want with no regard to the President's budget and the President's party tries to strike up a balance between those figures and the figures the President put forward.

Authorizations

Skip to main contentFind anythingAskLog In

Authorizations Act - A law that establishes or continues one or more Federal agencies or programs, establishes the terms and conditions under which they operate, authorizes the enactment of appropriations, and specifies how appropriated funds are to be used. Authorizations acts sometimes provide permanent appropriations.

I'm sure this is on the regular senate.gov site, but I can't find it. I'm sorry.

The passing of authorizations acts is technically the first part of the appropriations process in Congress, because they can predate the Federal budget that's currently in debate by a number of years (because most of them establish multi-year programs). Some authorizations, though, need to be renewed every year, like the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) that authorizes (you guessed it) defense programs.

Both chambers can produce authorizations, and basically every Member of Congress has the power to propose one of these kinds of bills, but other budgetary legislation is more exclusive.

Views and Estimates

Six weeks after the President's budget request comes in, and God knows how long after any particular authorization act passes, every single Congressional Committee is required to submit "views and estimates" of spending and revenues within its oversight jurisdiction to the House and Senate Budget Committees.

The views and estimates, along with information from other sources, are used by each Budget Committee in drafting and reporting a concurrent resolution on the budget to its respective chamber. The "information from other sources" I mentioned in that sentence is info gathered by the Budget Committees in reports and hearing testimony, and it usually consists of economic projections, programmatic information, and budget priorities. Those kinds of things come from a variety of sources, like the Congressional Budget Office (CBO), the Congressional Research Service (CRS), OMB, the Federal Reserve, Executive agencies, and Congressional leadership.

The Budget Resolution

The budget resolution is a concurrent resolution (meaning it's made it past both chambers a set of with thumbs ups). It represents an agreement between the House and Senate establishing budget priorities, and defining the parameters for all subsequent budgetary actions. You can treat it like Congress' official response to the President's budget request.

The budget resolution isn't binding, and technically it's not even part of the law. Instead, it's mostly a way to get both chambers of Congress onboard with more general aspects of the Federal budget, like its overall size, and its general composition in terms of functional categories. Functional category numbers are a topic of conversation a lot because these numbers get translated into allocations to each Committee with jurisdiction over spending in a process called "crosswalking" under Section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act. I'll talk about that more in the "204" post (if I ever make one), but everybody likes to throw around the "crosswalking" term for whatever reason, so just know this is the part of the process they're talking about.

When the budget resolution is ready in each of the chambers, it goes to a Conference Committee like any big bill. When it's in there, differences between the House and Senate versions are resolved and the final unified version is sent back to each chamber so it can be voted on.

Skip to main contentFind anything[!\[\]\(e78f798d4ea5c530c9db49e7d26e6b95_img.jpg\) Ask](#)Log In

Great question. This is one possible fork in the road that might take Congress into a "We need some Continuing Resolutions" type of year. What makes it worse is that the Congressional Budget and Impoundment Control Act of 1974 \(the CBA\), that made the rule requiring Congress pass a budget resolution, set this thing's due date on tax day: April 15th. Since FY1977, though, Congress pretty frequently misses the due date, and in a few pretty recent years (FY1999, FY2003, FY2005, FY2007, FY2011-FY2015, and FY2017) Congress didn't adopt a budget resolution at all.

Is that a bad thing? Kind of. There's no direct penalty on Members of Congress if the budget resolution isn't completed before April 15, or not at all, but there are ramifications to both of these scenarios.

For example: certain enforceable spending ceilings associated with the budget resolution aren't established until the budget resolution is completed, mixing the process up a bit when the budget reaches the House and Senate floors (more on that later). The CBA also prohibits both House and Senate floor consideration of appropriations measures for the upcoming fiscal year before Congress completes the budget resolution and, in the Senate, before the Senate Appropriations Committee receives its spending ceilings. The CBA does allow the House to consider most appropriations measures after May 15, though, even if the budget resolution has not been adopted by Congress, and the Senate can adopt a motion to waive this CBA requirement for spending ceilings by a majority vote. More broadly too, if Congress delays completion of the annual budget resolution (or skips adopting one outright), each chamber can adopt a deeming resolution to address these procedural difficulties, essentially saying "yeah we don't want to play by the rules this year." That's usually an option that's taken when the majority party in both chambers is the same, and the majority party just doesn't want the minority party obstructing the process.

The Appropriations Committees

There are 12 appropriations bills:

- Agriculture, Rural Development, Food and Drug Administration, and Related Agencies
- Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies
- Defense
- Energy and Water Development
- Financial Services and General Government
- Homeland Security
- Interior, Environment, and Related Agencies
- Labor, Health and Human Services, Education, and Related Agencies
- Legislative Branch
- Military Construction, Veterans Affairs, and Related Agencies
- State, Foreign Operations, and Related Programs
- Transportation, Housing and Urban Development, and Related Agencies

These bills share their names with the subcommittees within the House and Senate appropriations committees that hold oversight of the bill's jurisdiction. Starting in May (for the House) and June (for the Senate) these subcommittees hold hearings to gain information about their particular bill. That info comes from in-person testimony, written testimony, and reports from CRS, the CBO, and sources within the Executive Branch. After they conduct these hearings, the House and Senate Appropriations Committees (the full

Skip to main contentFind anything[!\[\]\(c3d993ca47bfe2a953c700506ce31fa0_img.jpg\) Ask](#)Log In

Senate Appropriations Committee consider each of their subcommittee's recommendations separately, and the committees can adopt amendments to a subcommittee's recommendations prior to reporting the bills and making them available for further consideration by their respective chambers.

From a functional standpoint you have to remember that if you're a Member of Congress on the full committee, you're in one or more subcommittees. What that means is it's not like subcommittees and full committees are two separate groups here, in essence the people who negotiate at the subcommittee level need to report their work to themselves, while specifically courting the favor of their colleagues who weren't at the negotiating table with them. In the Senate, since the full committee is relatively small, Senators find themselves on a significant number of subcommittees. My old boss Senator Van Hollen is the most junior Senator on the minority side of the Appropriations Committee (meaning he has the least clout of anybody up there), but he still serves in the subcommittees on the Legislative Branch; Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies; Financial Services and General Government; the Department of the Interior, Environment, and Related Agencies; and State, Foreign Operations, and Related Programs. That's 5/12, not bad for the lowest ranked person up there.

This is a sticky part of the process nonetheless. One wrong turn and somebody goes into dissent over some number somewhere and the bills need more time to get negotiated. That being said, bills love getting stuck in the next step of the process.

Floor Consideration: Where the Fun Begins

Part 1: The House of Representatives When the House is considering a bill on the floor (remember there are 12 of these things, categories listed above), they do this thing where they set up a committee called "Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union" (which usually gets shortened down to "the Committee of the Whole"). Every Member of the House of Representatives is a member of the Committee of the Whole, and when they're together like this there's a special rule for appropriations bills that provides for one hour of general debate on the bill in question. General debate includes opening statements by the Chair and Ranking Minority Member of the appropriations subcommittee with jurisdiction over the regular bill, and comments from other interested Representatives.

One hour is a short time, but that's because most of the floor process isn't spent on general debate. See, after the Committee of the Whole exits general debate, it considers amendments. That's when appropriations bill is read for amendment, paragraph by paragraph, and Representatives can jump in to add an amendment when the reading gets to where the amendment would go.

There are a series of restrictions on amendments to appropriations bills, like "House standing rules and precedents requiring amendments to be germane to the bill," for example, or "Spending limits imposed by the congressional budget process" (that shit from the budget resolution).

Alongside these two examples, there's a whole list of different reasons an amendment could be out of order, and if one amendment is out of order then any Representative can raise a point of order to call that out. These points of order aren't self-enforcing. A Member has to raise a point of order that an amendment violates a specific rule, and then if the presiding officer rules the amendment out of order, it cannot be considered by the House. Also, a special rule or unanimous consent agreement can waive requirements imposed by House rules or the budget process, thereby allowing the House to consider the amendment. Again, Congress decides what rules to play by.

Skip to main contentFind anythingAskLog In

Part 2: The Senate There's a pretty new practice going on where the full Senate considers the text of a bill as reported by the Senate Appropriations Committee in the form of a substitute to the House-passed appropriations bills. It's a fun way to make sure the budget doesn't pass on time.

Unlike in the House, the Senate doesn't have a Committee of the Whole. There's only 100 people in there, though, so it really doesn't matter. When the bill is brought up on the floor, the Chair and Ranking Minority Member of the appropriations subcommittee responsible for the bill in question make opening statements on the contents of the bill as reported. Instead of going paragraph by paragraph and amending the bill, a sensible but time-consuming process, Senators can propose amendments to any portion of the bill at any time it's pending unless the Senate agrees to set limits. This way of doing things makes the amendment process faster but harder to keep track of, and it's only possible because there are differences in House and Senate procedure. See, bills in the Senate can be "in consideration" but not currently the topic of discussion, it's something I don't really understand I'll be honest with you.

Committee and floor amendments to the bills in question have restrictions just like they do in the House. Amendments need to meet requirements established under the Senate standing rules and precedents, and the congressional budget process, as well as any requirements agreed to by unanimous consent. The specifics of the Senate and House rules for general appropriations bills are a bit different, including the waiver procedures, but just like the House, the Senate cares quite a bit about the enforcement of spending limits in particular.

For the most part the chambers do the same thing, and you only run into differences because of complications in Senate procedure, but that's a topic for another time.

Conferencing

The Constitution requires that the House and Senate approve the same measure with precisely the same provisions before it can be presented to the President for his (or, someday, her) signature or veto. This means that once the House and Senate have both completed initial consideration of one out of the 12 appropriations measures, the Appropriations Committees in each chamber will sit down and negotiate a resolution of the differences between their respective versions.

Generally, the House and the Senate convene a conference committee to resolve differences between the versions of the various appropriations bills. Alternatively, agreement can be reached through an exchange of amendments between the chambers, but this is less common. Nowadays, the Senate typically passes the full House bill, with the Senate version attached as a single substitute amendment. As a result, the House and Senate resolve their differences based on disagreement on the entire measure. Members of the House and Senate appropriations subcommittees having oversight jurisdiction over the appropriations bill in question, as well as the chair and ranking minority members of the full committees, are designated as conferees or managers and they meet to negotiate over differences between the versions of the bill.

There are restrictions on what these guys can do when they're conferencing, specifically that conferees have to negotiate within the scope of the differences on those matters in disagreement, and not just start creating new nonsense to add to the bills while they're in agreement with each other. Once conferees reach agreement on all points of difference, they write up and sign a conference report, which proposes a new conference substitute for the bill as a whole. Completion of the conference report isn't on a specified timeline, so chamber.

Skip to main contentFind anything[!\[\]\(cbe80b694ebd74fcfe136a095b608235_img.jpg\) Ask](#)Log In

The first chamber to consider the conference report (which is usually the House, but sometimes it's the Senate) can vote to: adopt it, reject it, or recommit it to the conference for further consideration. After the first chamber adopts the conference report, the conference is automatically disbanded, so the second chamber has two options: adopt or reject the conference report. In cases where the conference report is either rejected or recommitted to the conference committee, the two chambers need to negotiate further over the matters in dispute because, of course, the measure can't be sent to the President until both houses have agreed to the entire text of the bill. This can take months, and it's probably the most frequent reason for the budget not passing before October 1st.

Presidential Action

When budget bills do pass in both chambers, they stop behaving in extraordinary ways and they end up like any other bill: presented to the President, awaiting a veto or a signature. All the standard rules apply here: the President can Pocket Veto a bill, Congress can override a veto with a two-thirds majority in both chambers, the President can sign the bill, it's nothing fancy at this point.

"Special" Scenarios

Stopgaps The last time Congress and the President respectively passed and signed all 12 budget bills before October 1st was in 1996. I was born in 1998. I have never lived to see this shit happen, which is kind of crazy when I think about it but that's beside the point. When Congress and the President don't hit the October 1st deadline, they have two options at their disposal: let part or all of the Government shut down, or pass some Continuing Resolutions (CR).

Aside from the official name, these things are called Stopgaps, and they serve to make sure there is funding for Federal activities while Congress works on passing the budget bill related to that activity. These resolutions have a term of expiration, maxing out at a full fiscal year but usually lasting somewhere in the ballpark of 6-12 weeks, and technically they can give agencies and programs any amount of money. What that implies is that certain Federal agencies and programs could be shut down even if a CR is active, which is part of the reason agency folks hate these things so much.

Omnibus Bills There are 12 budget bills, but sometimes Congress passes one or more omnibus bills instead of going through each of the 12. Omnibus bills can serve the role of being one giant bill that funds everything the 12 bills would have funded, or they can just be the combination of two or three of the 12 budget bills. CRS keeps a public tracker of all 12 budget bills by the way, so you can see that for the FY2020 budget there were a number of these "Consolidated Appropriations Acts" that made their way into law, providing funding for all 12 categories.

Conclusions

There are a lot of ways the budget can go off the rails. For a pretty long time there's been a desire from people in Congress and in the Executive branch to switch to a two year budgeting system, essentially requiring each inaugurated Congress to pass one budget instead of having each Congress pass one budget for its first session and one in its second session. It's a plan that I'm a pretty big fan of personally, but for whatever reason it's just not a big priority. Maybe it should be. I'd like to hear your thoughts on that.

Skip to main contentFind anythingAskLog In things which I definitely think deserve highlighting. I've never worked in a Federal agency, so all of the information above on what OMB and the agencies do is textbook. A first-hand account, though, like the one in the comment below definitely needs to be showcased.

Thorough write up! I spend several years involved in the budget process at DHS in the executive branch.

Around January 20XX-2, OMB would give us vague guidance for how much the Department could submit in the upcoming FY20XX budget. The Department would then do the same to the subagencies, and they would have 2 months to submit their plans to the Department. However, usually subagencies would have already started that work in Fall 20XX-3. Then the Department leaders would make decisions on what to fund around summer, and send that to OMB around September as you said. Sometimes OMB will change their guidance at random based on what the WH wants.

My takeaways from being a part of it were, firstly, the process is too intensive in the current political climate. Congress doesn't really care that much, they will fund whatever they want. Secondly, no agency will admit they need to change or reduce. Thirdly, I'm more wary of news reports saying, "the (President's) Administration wants to do X". Most of the decision making is decentralized, and sometimes an agency proposes a "poison pill" cut precisely because they know it won't happen but need room to add another request to the budget. But more importantly, the current administration is so incompetent that what they say they're considering is mostly ignored by Congress and civil servants. Lastly, the sunk cost fallacy is very real. Lots of ineffective or unnecessary programs continue simply because they've already been started. There are always the lower-level people trying to fix the situation, but most leaders (executive and congressional) won't admit failure.

↑ 52 ↓ 3

Join the conversation

Sort by: Best ▾

🔍 Search Comments

Horcruxno13 • 6y ago

That was a fun read.

FireDistinguishers OP • 6y ago

Thanks man, I know this kind of stuff can be kind of humdrum but I was hoping my Star Wars references could keep things interesting

Skip to main contentFind anythingAskLog In

This submission has been flaired as an effortpost. Please only use this flair for submissions that are original content and contain high-level analysis or arguments. Click here to see previous effortposts submitted to this subreddit. If you're using this flair ironically, please use the "Effortpost" flair instead.

Good effortposts may be added to the subreddit's featured posts. Additionally, users who have submitted effortposts are eligible for custom blue text flairs. Please contact the moderators if you believe your post qualifies.

I am a bot, and this action was performed automatically. Please contact the moderators of this subreddit if you have any questions or concerns.

Related posts

r/neoliberal • 8mo ago

Federal budget's fiscal targets unlikely to be met, interim PBO says

40 upvotes • 7 comments

r/neoliberal • 2mo ago

Prime Minister declines to offer evidence to back his claim he was mischaracterised in emails

43 upvotes • 7 comments

r/neoliberal • 2mo ago

The Aides Keeping the President in the Dark [gift article]

285 upvotes • 81 comments

r/neoliberal • 4mo ago

When public participation strengthens—and weakens—democratic governance

37 upvotes • 9 comments

Skip to main content

Find anything

Ask

Log In

35 upvotes · 11 comments

 r/neoliberal · 4mo ago

Fight for something: 'Good governance' is not enough

86 upvotes · 83 comments

 r/neoliberal · 1y ago

After thousands of hours combing the studies and the metadata, I summed up all of our knowledge of the housing crisis into this graphic - I can take questions in the comments

1.4K upvotes · 170 comments

 r/neoliberal · 2mo ago

MY PRESIDENT 🇺🇸🇺🇸🇺🇸🇺🇸

268 upvotes · 37 comments

 r/neoliberal · 10mo ago

A budget battle offers Democrats a chance to show some backbone. They need a clearer strategy first

97 upvotes · 21 comments

 r/neoliberal · 1mo ago

Municipalities have more responsibilities without more funding

44 upvotes · 9 comments

 r/neoliberal · 2mo ago

Mutually Assured Democracy, hold the criminals accountable?

103 upvotes · 46 comments

 r/neoliberal · 10mo ago

Science study: During 1980-2020, Congress appropriated more funds to science and research when Republicans controlled the House. The findings indicate that historically there has been bipartisan...

189 upvotes · 41 comments

Skip to main contentFind anythingAskLog In

keep in mind that the median swing voters are not committed centrists but people like this

554 upvotes · 223 comments

r/neoliberal · 5mo ago

I dream of a sortitioned democracy where we don't have to live under the tyranny of the median voter anymore

396 upvotes · 128 comments

r/neoliberal · 5mo ago

How governments are increasingly soaking the rich

121 upvotes · 147 comments

r/neoliberal · 1mo ago

The Opposition That Could Not Deliver

123 upvotes · 35 comments

r/neoliberal · 9mo ago

When the President declares authority over all spending because his own party cannot gavel in even to pass an easy "pay the soldiers" bill

588 upvotes · 56 comments

r/neoliberal · 2mo ago

My fiscal responsibility left me

1K upvotes · 222 comments

r/neoliberal · 6mo ago

Remember when a controversy was when a presidential candidate understood corporate income tax incidence. I remember:

171 upvotes · 54 comments

r/neoliberal · 10d ago

The Myth of Authoritarian Efficiency

Skip to main contentFind anythingAskLog In

Gullible, Cynical America

391 upvotes · 87 comments

r/neoliberal · 14d ago

What positions on issues do you hold that places you in opposition to the policy approach on that particular issue by the party you nonetheless decide to vote for?

18 upvotes · 41 comments

r/neoliberal · 4mo ago

It is not healthy for every successive American election to be a furious repudiation of the status quo, and I'm not sure how we break out of this cycle.

546 upvotes · 168 comments

r/neoliberal · 3mo ago

Government looks to prorogue Parliament if Liberals sweep April 13 by-elections

40 upvotes · 10 comments

r/neoliberal · 6mo ago

A new spate of Justice Department officials quit because their section didn't want to probe Renee Good's shooting

270 upvotes · 23 comments

theatla...

theglob...

ms

TOP POSTS

Reddit

reReddit: Top posts of July 27, 2020

Reddit

reReddit: Top posts of July 2020

Reddit

reReddit: Top posts of 2020

Find anything

Ask

Log In